HOW'S IT GROWING?

THE HOMEFIELD ADVANTAGE OF A MORE CONNECTED SUPPLY CHAIN.

ANOTHER SEASON,
STILL GROWING STRONG.

Green bean and lima bean harvest wrapped up in early October, while Minnesota plants completed corn harvest at the end of September. Western and Eastern Wisconsin are set to finish corn harvest next week, bringing another strong stretch of the season to a close.

WHAT WE'VE GOT ON DECK.

Beet and carrot harvest kicked off at the beginning of October and is now in full swing. Both crops are expected to continue through mid-November, keeping teams in the field as the harvest season moves into its final stretch.

THE HOMEFIELD ADVANTAGE

When supply chains get more complicated, closer connections can become a competitive advantage.

Strategically utilizing imports can help meet year-round demand and supplement our already strong domestic offerings without sacrificing quality and food safety. But when food can be grown and produced closer to home, there are meaningful advantages. Lakeside Foods' domestic network creates a shorter, more connected supply chain with closer grower relationships, greater traceability and fewer links between the field and the customer.

DOMESTIC SOURCING

KNOW WHERE IT STARTED.

Traceability begins with visibility. Our close relationships with growers help us identify where products were grown and move quickly when customers need origin information.

BUILT FOR RESILIENCE.

A more connected supply chain can support greater continuity, responsiveness and predictability when conditions change.

FEWER HANDOFFS. MORE LINE OF SIGHT.

A shorter domestic supply chain means fewer links between grower, processor and customer, helping make audits, communication, and traceback more direct.

INVESTED CLOSE TO HOME.

Local sourcing also means supporting the growers, employees, and communities that make American agriculture possible.

CLOSER CONNECTIONS.

GREATER CONFIDENCE.

Food safety is built into the work from field to delivery. Lakeside Foods combines strong grower relationships with audits, traceability systems, defined requirements, and teams empowered to ask questions and make the right decisions. That all works together to help protect quality and maintain visibility throughout our supply chain.

The advantage goes beyond geography. It's knowing the source, understanding the supply chain, and having confidence in the people and processes behind the product.

THE HEALTH CONVERSATION IS COMING TO THE TABLE.

Nutrition is taking a more central role in conversations about health and healthcare. Growing research around the idea of "food is medicine" reflects a broader recognition that what we eat can play an important role in supporting health, and that food deserves a bigger place in how we think about care, prevention, and overall well-being.

HOW WE PLAY A PART.

Especially as we head into cold and flu season, we pay close attention to research shaping how people think about food, nutrition, and product innovation. That includes growing interest in nutrients such as protein and fiber, as well as the role frozen vegetables can play in making nutritious choices convenient and accessible.

Research from the University of Georgia also found that frozen produce was generally comparable in vitamin and mineral content to produce stored under refrigeration, and in some cases, retained nutrients as well or better after several days of storage.

Research like this is one more reason to keep nutrition in the conversation as we think about what's next.
